AFRINT!...?

Poverty in sub-Saharan Africa is predominantly a rural and agricultural phenomenon. AFRINT is the acronym of a research project undertaken during 10 years in cooperation between Lund University, Linköping University and several African universities in order to deepen the understanding of how agricultural development reveals at farm level as response to infrastructure, cash-crop production, food security, macro-economic and agricultural policy. In the talk there will be given an overview of the project and also discussed some statistical problems and questions emerging from and encountered within the project.
