

Abstract:

Geo-mapping of health outcomes, usually referred to as disease mapping, can provide valuable results. Traditional applications of disease mapping include e.g. production of a cancer atlas. New applications of disease mapping, using established Bayesian methods, will be presented: caries risk in childhood; screening uptake; and incidence of advanced-stage cancer. The implications of these novel applications will be highlighted.